MALADIE DU PAYS.

My grandsire sat in his easy chair This morn at my cottage door, The soft wind waved his silvery hair, The flowers perfumed the summer air. The songs of birds were loud and sweet, My baby played at the old man's feet With shadow leaves on the floor.

My grandsire gazed on the Eastern sky And waved his trembling hand, As heaved his breast with a sobbing sigh, And his lips breathed softly: "Ah, good-bye Thou home of my fresh young life a part, First love of my manhood's daring heart, Good-bye, my Maryland."

"Nay, grandsire, why regretful be?"
"Twas thus I chided him;
And I pat my baby upon his knee
As he houghed and cocod in infant glee;
And grandfather kissed and praised the child, But while his white lips talked and smiled, His eyes with tears were dim.

Look forth o'er all this broad expanse Of forest, farm and les; See sun and shadow flit and dance; No hand of history or romance Shows fairer scenes to the constant sur Than these in our vale where the brooklets dies;

But I hope some day to stand.
In the wide-flung gates of Paradise,
And feast my hungry, home-sick eyes.
On the woods and fields and streams I knew.

The sunset gilds the low green hills
As I fold with careful hand
The clock to screen from evening's chill
My grandsire's form—but, his heart is still. He died with the day; and in Paradise; Mayhap be vails his raptured eyes, And leans from the pearly gates alar To trace the course of a distant star, And gaze on Maryland.

is dull," said a Big Four passenger brakeman. "When a fellow goes spinning over the country thirty and forty and fifty miles an hour he can't help feeling the blood surge through his veins, and that is the excitement of it: but when he spends hour after hour on the train, and, except when calling stations, he is silent as the tomb, then he feels it is dull. Funny things sometimes happen, but after going through with the conductor and seeing the queer encounters he has with cranks on board for about two days a fellow gets tired and almost wishes the conductor would get into a fight just to stir things some times the quiet passenger who takes every thing as a matter of course, who does not carry a valise, and always has his ticket ready, and never annoys any one, and who gets up to give woman his seat-he is just a curiosity by reason of the contrast. There's the green boy from the slashes; he never rode on the train before, and he doesn't know enough to keep the flies from crawling down his throat. His thick curled lips stand apart like the jaws of a hippopotamus in the circus picturesheap worse than they do when you look at the brute in the cage. His sister is as green as he is, and so bashful and so full of herself that she thinks all the world is looking at her. Her father wears the frown which he has acquired in training his wife to live with him without asking him for money enough to get her a good calico dress. He always has a quarrel with the conductor, and ends by handing out more cash to pay fare for the son. The mother, tired and worn out, with her baby in her arms, appears to have carried the burdens of the world on her shoulders so sitting down quietly and enjoying the ride, but must continue to be anxious lest some accident happens.

"Yes, I've seen all of them many a time. There are the commercial travelers, and you can generally tell their various lines of business. A hardware drummer is crisp, practical, able and willing to stand up for his rights; would like to have a whole seat, but won't quarrel about it. The dry goods salesman is languid; travels as if he were the Czar of Russia; tries to look like a martyr while riding, and yet really enjoys it; smokes good cigars; and does not care who knows it; can tell a joke in any company, and would feel at home in a flirtation. The drug drummer is a queer fellow; so nice and neat, and smells of his drugs; always smokes a cigarette; has a way of dressing that suggets a calico dressing-gown and slippers; recognizes in the conductor a necyet is a very pleasant man with very pleasant weaknesses. The grocery salesman is another man. He always acts as if he owned a controling interest in the road and was thinking of purchasing the whole train. He is not averse to telling the conductor he is wrong, and is in error; would be ready to aid you with his suggestions and clinch his friendship by passing his favorite cigars around. He pers, buys books, makes calculations and carries on just as though he did not know anybody was around but himself."

times. One time, I remember, we took aboard an old woman at Shelbyville. She wanted to go to Adams, and after the second stop she began to annoy me about it; wanted to know if we'd be sure to stop; and finally I got tired and went to the other end of the car. It was getting dark, and the old woman peered out of the win-dow. We were then going at least thirty miles an hour, and all at once the old lady rushed to the rear platform of the car. I started to bring her back, but I hope to die if she didn't jump off just as I was going to take hold of her. As soon as she struck the bed of the road she came rolling along after the train, turning back somersaults faster than the wheels turned. I saw her roll over, I guess, about two hundred and fifty times, and then we were away ahead in the darkness. "She's dead," was my thought, but I pulled the hall cold and and the contract of the road and in the darkness. "She's dead," was my thought, but I pulled the label of the road and in the darkness. "She's dead," was my thought, but I pulled the dead," was my thought, but I pulled the bell-cord, and in a couple of minutes the train came to a stand-still. The conductor, and hurried back to ask me what was the matter. I told bim, and we began backhalf a mile, we were astounded to see the old woman walking toward us, not her fist at me and said I should be reported, and she'd sue the road for damages, and see that her boy gave me the neatest when the train whistied she thought it was for Adams, and when she peered out or city property. N. F. Niederlander. of the window she thought she saw the town, and we didn't mean to let her off. pulled up at Adams, and never spoke a word till she stepped off, when I said, in my sweetest tones: 'Good-bye, auntie.
